Base: All respondents

Summary table

	People using social networking websites like Facebook to promote Islamic State should have their accounts suspended	Social media websites should hand over to the Government the personal details of anyone using their account to organise Islamic State activity	The revelations of internet spying by Edward Snowden last year shows that governments should not have access to private information on the web, whatever the website is being used for	Britain needs tougher anti-terrorism laws	It is better that Islamic State militants be allowed to continue using social media where they can be monitored, than to stop them using it altogether	Instead of engaging in Iraq and Syria, the British Government's main focus should be on preventing radicalisation inside the UK	Military action in Iraq and Syria is likely to help prevent 'home grown' terrorism in the UK
